Hugh's Practices at Berrick Salome (6) and Little Milton (6) on Saturday 16th March

Given that the name Berrick denotes the presence of barley farming here, and this coupled with the recent chill from the fringes of the weather system nicknamed the 'Beast from the East', it could possibly be apposite to quote Robert Burns who wrote that: 'the cock may crawl, the day may daw, and aye we'll taste the barley-bree (broth)'. It is easy to surmise that warm sustenance akin to this would have been the order of the day locally for many centuries. With the early 18th century pub here (The Chequers) there would have been little chance of encountering the malt and barley blues. The church with its unforgettable timber-framed tower is set away from the village and during the time we were there was a hive of activity in the churchyard as snowdrop bulbs were being planted for next year. The church in Little Milton is a relatively recent building (1844), constructed in a distinctive 14th century style, and the tower added in 1861. Nascent ringers, or those of us who remember our embryonic ringing days, will no doubt be cognisant with the exhortation to refrain from looking up when ringing as all one is likely to receive is dust in the eye, well here the advice is not to look down when nearly atop the ladder for the extent of what you will spy. The climb up the ladder is daunting, but well worth the effort. The song may state that there are "Three Steps to Heaven" but here there are 33 steps to some heavenly bells. By the end of the afternoon hopefully everyone had practiced what they had set out to, and we were inordinately grateful for the extra conductor provided by Little Milton tower, namely the lightning conductor, as thunder and lightning briefly raged outside as we were starting some Plain Bob Minor as opposed to a polka. Hugh Deam.

A Branch Practice at Wolvercote (6)

On the cold, wet morning of Saturday 9th March, a group of us of all ringing abilities met up for a short practice on the delightful bells at Wolvercote. The relatively long draught and fairly light bells, was a little challenging for some, but it wasn't long before we were ringing everything from Plain Hunting to Cambridge Surprise Minor – enjoyed by all!

Paul Lucas.
